More about June

In ancient Rome it was considered inauspicious to get married until after 15 June but later on Plutarch implied that the entire month of June was more favourable for weddings than May.

In Norway and Finland it was believed that if a girl picked 7 different flowers in the silence of the Midsummer Night and put them underneath her pillow she would dream of her future husband.

Flaming June

This is from an article by Stephen Davenport dated 15 June 2011

“The disappointing June weather continues and the cool and unsettled conditions since the first few days of the month have prompted many to sardonically comment on the absence of a Flaming June.

The phrase Flaming June has seeped into the national conscience. Despite the fact that Flaming June was originally nothing to do with early summer heat; rather, it was the title of an aesthetic late-Victorian painting by the artist Fredric Lord Leighton completed in 1895, a year before his death.”
